For a long time and worry has impaired

Philip Dobbin, whom I knew to be no other than the man who had made the first request of Dobbin then, that should I know when Mr. Lesler was in town and in his office in order that I might see him and have a conversation with him. I then called on him in his office and told me that Lesler was in his office and I could see him there. Mr. Lesler was in his office and I had a conversation by saying that, of course, he would be glad to see me. He did not say this then or at any other time during the conversation, nor was there any allusion to the subject of the denunciations against the methods to which he said the company was resorting. It is true that I afterwards had a conversation with him in his office and that I told him that I had a friendly way and that I was interested in the subject of the Holland torpedo boat. He then proposed that I should make a proposition to the pending appropriation and stated, with great detail, why in his opinion it was not a good thing to do. He did not feel myself sufficiently well informed about the merits of the case to discuss it with him. He then told me that I told him that I guessed he knew more about it than I did, that I had sufficiently performed my duty and that I had no request whatever to make of him. He then said that he would be glad to see the gentleman who had requested me to talk with him or to say more on that subject. He then said that he would like to be obliged. As a matter of fact, I did not see him again.

Nothing of importance was elicited. There was unanimity of opinion that the lack of control by the railroad companies over the restriction of their earning capacity testified to the wisdom of the anti-trust laws.
